Sequestration of selenium by mixed wheat/clover pastures for sheep grazing on seleniferous pastures. Three successive periods of feeding on a Pasture Herd Experimental (PHE) diet (81 and 72 g Se kg⁻¹ DM) based on mixed ryegrass and white clover (36:64) were compared with seleniferous pastures of 100 g Se kg⁻¹ DM when grazed by sheep in a grazing trial on a hill-slope in the Tarragona (SE Spain). The replacement of around 30% of the native forage by mixed forage had no effects on herbage weight or on dry matter intake. In the three grazing periods, losses of Se from the total diet were similar in the herbage (22) and urine (25) samples and the excreted Se in the faeces was negligible (1%). In spite of the fact that there was no detectable increase in the uptake of Se by sheep from this Se-deficient forage, the retention of Se in the faeces after the grazing period was around twice that of the control group. The difference was most evident during the third grazing period. For the different grazing periods in the PHE group, a significant correlation was observed between the content of Se in urine and faeces. The replacement of seleniferous pastures by mixed forages did not induce a significant increase in the concentration of Se in the sheep's blood. The Se content in the blood did not increase either with the amount of Se in the diet (approx. 50 mg d⁻¹ Se) and the duration of the grazing period (one month). The results obtained from the incorporation of Se from this mixed wheat/clover pasture support the idea of its use in areas where the vegetation is not seleniferous and where the use of inorganic Se supplements might be of no benefit to livestock./* * Copyright (C) 2010 Apple Inc. Abstract We argue that a persistent alliance with a single political party forms the public goods and political legitimacy of institutions. The public goods model explains why two-party electoral alliances work and why they may be unstable for those without a stake in government. Political parties function as aggregators of social capital, allowing constituents to socialize their preferences and develop social ties. Governance institutions conform to the political party's ideology because institutions benefit from the support of a single political party. We then consider two types of public goods that are valued in politics: functional legitimacy and electoral legitimacy. These public goods are central to the public service delivery system, judicial branches, and political parties. In their absence, the social capital embodied in institutions weakens and the quality of governance is undermined. These processes lead to fragmentation, political instability, and voter dissatisfaction, as we see in the United States over the last two decades. This article concludes by proposing a second role for parties in governance, the coordination of stakeholders.
